Four men, betrayed by the bank, unite to take revenge. German heavy-hitters Schweiger, Schweighöfer, and Liefers are cast as three ordinary Joes whose lives are unexpectedly brought together when the bank loses their life savings. The mishap is the product of a ploy by bank director Schumacher (Thomas Heinze) to get Tobias (Michael Bully Herbig), one of his tellers, fired. The three clients track down the helpless, gawky Tobias and decide to seek retribution. They transition seamlessly from discovering that their life savings have poofed into thin air to mapping out their bank teller’s murder to taking said bank teller hostage and intricately planning a big-time bank robbery — easily glossing over anything resembling shock, loss, or the like at their misfortunes.

A young family share their home with a malevolent spirit in the atmospheric debut of screenwriter Sergio G Sanchez. The past won't let go in Marrowbone, a slow-burn, atmospheric horror movie that doesn't lack for ambition or visual elegance. Set in 1969, the film stars MacKay as Jack, the oldest of four British children who have just moved to America with their dying mother (Nicola Harrison). After her passing, Jack decides that they must stay inside their big, secluded house until he's 21, when he can become his siblings' legal guardian — otherwise, the state would split them up. As the rest of the children hide in the home to avoid detection, Jack occasionally goes into town, where he falls for a local librarian (Taylor-Joy), but the family grows increasingly concerned that some malevolent spirit occupies the house's upper floor.
